

TRANS WORLD AIRLINES

Eero Saarinen

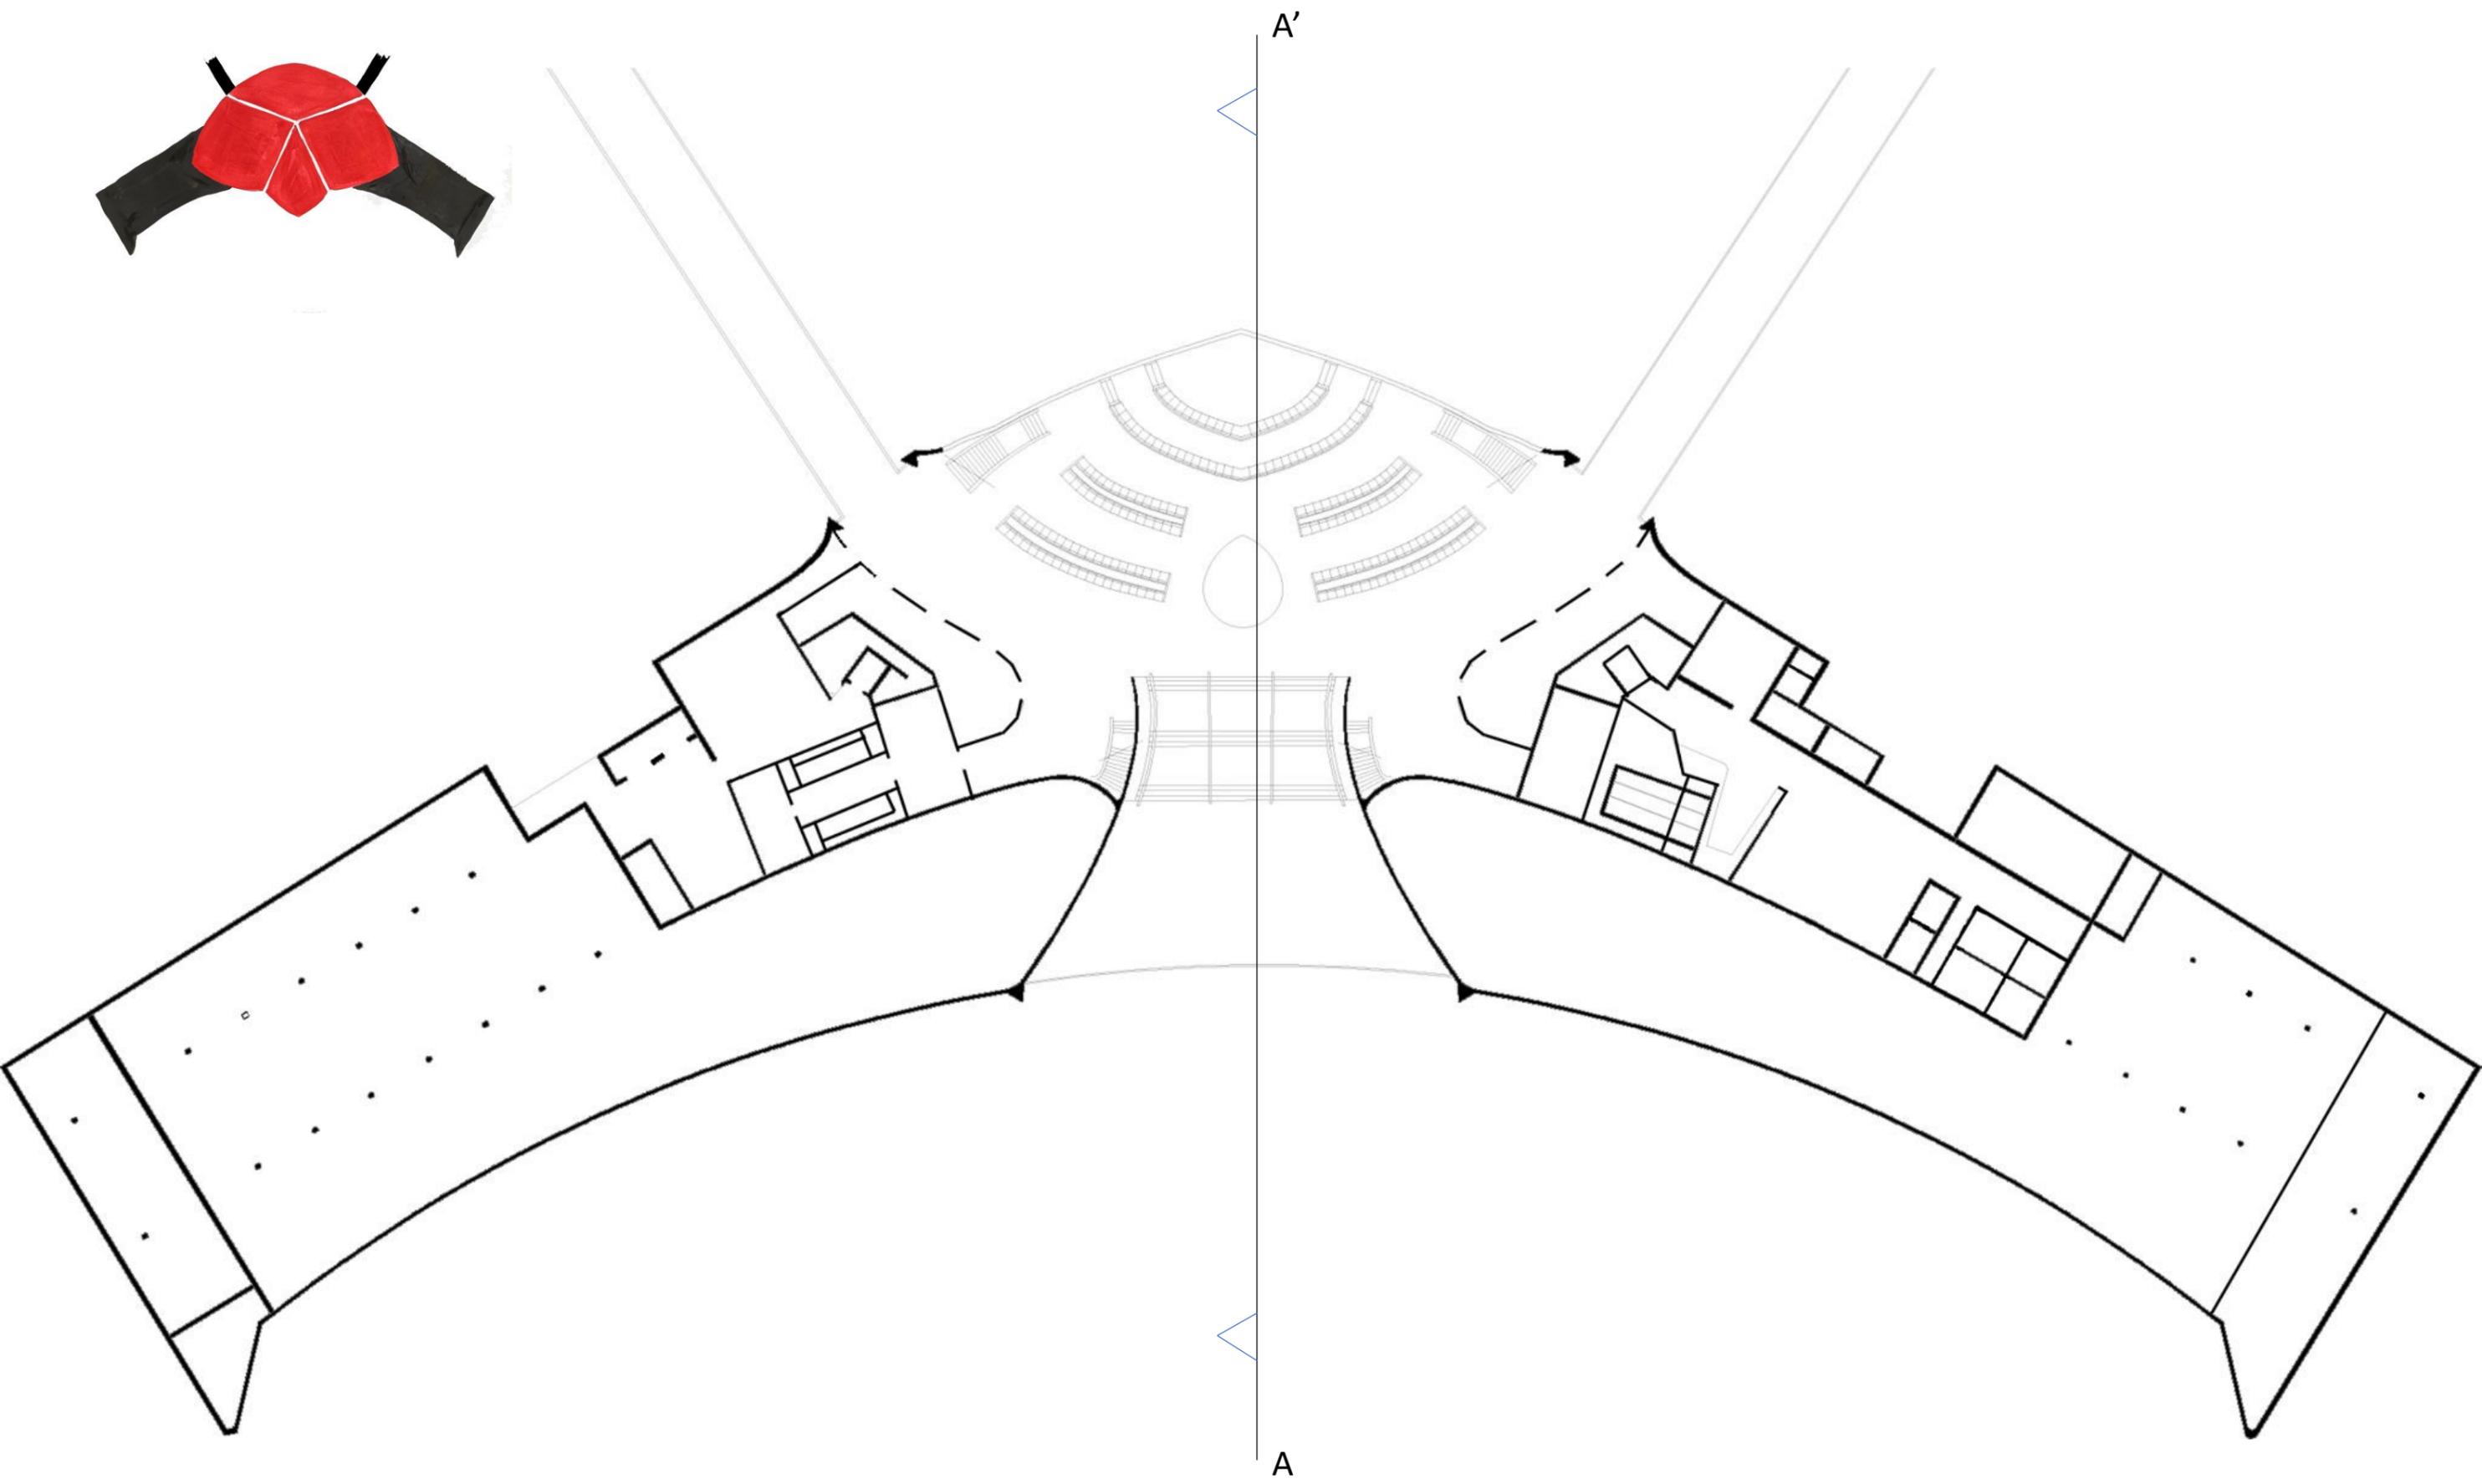

Le trans world airlines, œuvre d'Eero Saarinen, fut construit à New-York en 1962. Suite à la mort de Saarinen en 1961 le projet s'achèvera avec Kevin Roche, Cesar Pelli, Edward Saad et Norman Pettula. Longtemps représentée comme un oiseau Saarinen démentira les propos disant que c'était une pure coïncidence, ses propres inspirations venant de la machine volante de De Vinci et de son intérêt des nouvelles technologies. Le terminal semble clair dans ses intentions : le mouvement et la transition. Exaltant l'excitement du voyage. Le design pour l'époque semble futuriste. En effet, deux ailes immenses ouvrant sur d'énormes ouvertures donnant des vues sur l'arrivée et le départ des avions. Cette structure est renforcée par une toile métallique. Eero utilisera des carrelage courbes en céramique pour affirmer la carapace de l'édifice. L'idéologie de Saarinen était de composer une toute nouvelle architecture ou tout serait influencé par celle-ci : meubles, cuisines, éléments fonctionnels, manufactures et structures. Ainsi le TWA pouvait répondre à sa mission : un passage agréable dans le terminal.
